Wars, especially those before the twenty-first century, tend to be studied mostly from the male perspective, as if they involved and concerned only men. World War I is no exception. Shifting the emphasis from the battlefield to the home front, this talk will discuss World War I from the perspective of women in the Middle East. Focusing on women’s involvement in the war effort, the ways in which they are affected by wartime conditions, and how they used the war to advance women’s rights, this presentation will shed light on a neglected aspect of World War I.