

Historical Context

The Certificate of Forensic Identification was proposed by the Anthropology Department in May of 1994. It was approved in Executive Memorandum 94-031 on June 23, 1994 (EM is below).

Certificate in Forensic Identification

Executive Memorandum 94-031 June 23, 1994

From: Manuel A. Esteban, President

Subject: Certificate in Forensic Identification

The proposed certificate in Forensic Identification was recommended for approval by the Faculty Senate and the Provost. I approve implementation of this certificate, offered by the Department of Anthropology within the College of Behavioral and Social Sciences, effective fall 1995. The certificate does not require assignment of HEGIS code number for system-wide reporting.

When proposed, the stated objective of the Certificate was to assist in providing those students who have appropriate scientific training with additional study aimed at preparing them to enter a career with private, municipal, county, state, or federal criminal investigation agencies and laboratories. The major emphasis is on the application of science to legal issues. A copy of the current catalog listing for the certificate is included as Appendix A.

Program Outcomes

The current Certificate of Forensic Identification has three primary program outcomes:

- 1) To provide a diversified background in scientific and legal studies
- 2) To develop students' writing abilities, particularly scientific and report writing
- 2) To increase the professional development of students through internships in active forensic science laboratories and law enforcement agencies

This proposal is for a name change to the Certificate in Forensic Science. Forensic science is the proper, and commonly recognized, name for the field of study that uses science for the purposes of the law. The original name for the certificate uses an older term associated with the field of forensic science that now denotes sub-specialties focused primarily on trace evidence. It does not properly align with the field of study students enrolled in the certificate are seeking. In addition, the program outcomes outlined above are set up in accordance with the educational expectations for the field of forensic science as a whole, not a specific sub-specialty. Below are the suggested guidelines issued by the American Academy of Forensic Sciences for the background and skills needed to become a forensic scientist:

- A bachelor's degree – get a degree in science (chemistry, biology, physics, etc.), but also take courses in math, statistics, and writing skills.
- An advanced degree – some jobs, such as psychiatrist, anthropologist, or pathologist require advanced degrees and specialized training.
- Good speaking skills
- Good note-taking and observation skills – take laboratory courses.
- The ability to write an understandable scientific report
- The ability to be unbiased
- Intellectual curiosity
- Personal integrity

The American Academy of Forensic Sciences is the leading professional organization for the forensic field in the country. Like the field of forensic science, it is a multi-disciplinary organization encompassing physicians, attorneys, dentists, toxicologists, anthropologists, digital evidence experts, psychiatrists, engineers, chemists, criminalists, biologists, and others. The name change allows students in the program to concisely show potential employers as well as graduate programs coursework taken in accordance with the field of forensic science.

Past and present students

It is difficult to accurately count how many students are actively enrolled in the certificate because students may add it without consulting the certificate coordinator and they may drop active engagement in the program without dropping it off their program of study. We do, however, track consultation visits throughout each academic year. The last few years has seen between 105-113 students needing an advising appointment during each semester and an internship placement with various law enforcement agencies of approximately 15 senior students per year. Most of the internship placements happen outside of Butte County with both Northern and Southern California law enforcement agencies. The students actively participating in the program come from a wide variety of majors: anthropology, criminal justice, biology, chemistry, nursing, psychology, and others.

As part of the process for setting up internship placements, students are also instructed on how to build a curriculum vitae and how to fill out job applications for forensic science related postings. Three recent job postings that certificate students have qualified for are included as Appendix B. Overall, we have alumni of the certificate program working for coroner's/medical examiner's offices, sheriff's offices, California Department of Justice crime laboratories, the National Missing and Unidentified Persons System (NAMUS), U.S. Department of Defense, and other Universities/Colleges after graduate study.
